Hi <$firstname$>,

In your first message you learned that the US and UK aren't the safest or least expensive places to grow your wealth. In fact many lucrative investments are out there but you've never been allowed to hear about them. Today we'll go into this subject a bit more so you understand why and what you can do about it.

As you probably know, there's a global economy out there—international trade figures, jobs moving offshore and the rise and fall of the Yen, the British Pound and the Dollar—you've heard of them. These are but a small part of the overall world economy so there must be more to it investment-wise, right? Of course there is...

For Americans and citizens of other high tax social welfare states around the world, lawyers, regulators and Wall Street or other banking and financial special interests simply keep information about many hugely profitable investments and financial strategies away from the population. Investors in many other countries have the same problems: special interest groups and banks maintain information blackouts on many financial packages simply because they view them as competition. Often, people are told such investments are dangerous, unregulated and illegal when, in fact, they are everything 'but'.

For instance, according to Business Week, in a special class of 500 profitable mutual funds over 96% of them had double-digit gains. During the bear market going on, Apo Biotech posted 58% gains and the Special Europe Stock Fund posted 47%. Never heard of them? That's because regulators make sure none of these are available to US investors by regulations that prohibit US advertising of many of the very best offshore funds and hedge funds. They don't like competition.

In another example, a July 2003 New York Times article reported that developed economies like New Zealand and Australia were paying as much as 4.63% on CDs. With the appreciation of the New Zealand currency of 20% over the previous 12 months, you could have made 24% on your money. That's just sitting in the bank in a CD without doing anything else. Had you known, you could have bought these CDs at a local bank in many countries.

Why can't you find out about these? Because they're "offshore", meaning that they're located in or managed from other countries - like Hong Kong, Switzerland, Panama, Luxembourg and others. And that means they can't be over-regulated and milked for fees by the home government and regulators. Of course, this makes perfect sense as the government and local financial controllers in your country are protecting their turf from competition.

Obviously, someone somewhere is investing in these gigantic ventures and making lots of profits from them as well. Many are run by companies in Switzerland, Hong Kong and Luxembourg with literally hundreds of years of experience. Therefore, they must not really be any more illegal or dangerous than investing in Wal-Mart.

For Americans, it's perfectly legal to own these investments. But Wall Street and the SEC have made it nearly impossible for you to even find out about them unless you're wealthy and have great connections. In other countries, similar rules and regulations are implemented with varying degrees of legal success to prevent people from finding out about them.

But now, thanks to the Internet, many people are finding out about moneymaking opportunities outside their homelands through these "offshore" investments. However, between Internet crooks and active disinformation efforts by homeland regulators, it's hard to tell what's good, what's safe and what's real.

That's where the Venture Resources Group comes in. VRG helps members cut through the fog and haze of home country disinformation to find the real deals and the safe havens. Our members are able to restructure their financial worlds to comply with local regulations and taxes while enjoying incredible resources for finding the best and most lucrative investments worldwide.

When you become a member of VRG, you'll be able to find the great investments, learn how to best invest in them, how to make more money and how to protect what you make. You can also learn how to make money on the constant fluctuations between currencies and how to diversify into international real estate and global investments. Best of all you can join in group discussions with those who have successfully done it and profited from them. It's the best way to learn and profit there is!

We'll discuss some of these in the next message.
